Felix Council Report
A report by Matt Colin Felix Editor

I, Science

The science magazine was printed without any problems in early January, with the second of the year's three planned issues having an intended release date of March.

Gaming Magazine

We're still planning to go ahead with a magazine focused on gaming. The Editors have been receiving content since December, and we are now waiting for one of the Editors to return from overseas in the next couple of weeks before any decisions on layout and advertising are considered.

Phoenix

In the last week we held the first meeting for all interested parties, and will be advertising for content in the next few weeks. We are currently considering printing Phoenix as a separate magazine in a similar vein to I, Science rather than a pullout, such as last year's. We are also considering seeking sponsorship.

New printers

Following our last issue in December, we moved from our regular printers Harmsworth Printing to Iliffe Print Cambridge, a move that most London student papers have made in response to a rise in printing costs at Harmsworth.

Hangman/Daily Telegraph Controversy

A Hangman article printed in last Friday's issue caused offence online, which was reported in the Daily Telegraph and led to personal complaints. I've personally responded to all complaints received, and will be issuing a fuller apology in this week's Felix. The issue of quality control and Hangman has been brought into focus and I have been in contact with editors and contributors in order to rectify the situation for all future issues.
